Where the Past Comes to Life

This Insider's Guide to Automotive Museums is a dream come true for me.

I have long wanted a listing of the most significant museums in the U.S. in one easy-to-access digest. This guide fulfills that need. I'm keeping a copy in my glovebox.

I love automotive museums of all types, from the rigorous, intellectually challenging Petersen and Revs collections to "I bought it because I liked it" private collections.

The history of the automobile spans little more than 130 years, starting with the Benz Patent-Motorwagen in 1886. Thus in a single museum you can often follow the evolution of the motor car from the horseless carriage to the Bugatti Chiron.

As you stroll through the museums listed here, reflect on what the cars on display tell you about the tastes of the owners who collected them. The cars and the people behind them are inextricably intertwined, as it should be with these four-wheeled chariots of passion.

Making a Museum Great

What makes a museum speak to me is the same, regardless of the theme

By Donald Osborne

Courtesy of Petersen Automotive Museum

The redesigned structure of the Petersen Museum in Los Angeles, CA, is a work of art in itself

I love museums. Of course, being both a passionate enthusiast as well as a professional in the field of cars, automotive museums hold a particularly dear place in my heart.

What makes a museum speak to me is the same, regardless of the theme. I want to see things I've never seen before in person, find out a new fact about something I thought I knew well and visit for a bit with an object I've admired for a long time.

The best museums do this effortlessly, through the presentation of carefully assembled and curated collections, well-researched and clearly presented special exhibitions, and a knowledgeable and enthusiastic staff and volunteers who bring a personal touch in connecting the displays with the visitors.

I have been thrilled by visits to many automotive museums in the U.S., the U.K. and Europe and, like naming your favorite car, listing the ones I find the "best" is quite difficult. But my assignment here is to share what I feel makes an automotive museum "great." So to that end, here is how the above criteria have been met in a few of the venues I've enjoyed spending time in over the years.

Preservation and promotion

One of the chief missions of any museum is the preservation, promotion and dissemination of historical information. This is best done through the gathering of a collection that has been carefully curated to communicate a clear and consistent story.

A prime example of this for me is the Simeone Foundation Museum in Philadelphia, PA. Based on the collection of sports racing cars donated to the foundation by founder Dr. Frederick Simeone, this museum consists of one of the most spectacular collections of original historic racing cars of the 20th century.

Dr. Simeone is devoted to the preservation of living legends, and most amazingly, demonstration runs regularly held in the large lot behind the museum showcase the cars of the museum as they should be — loud and live. This is no fossil repository, regardless of the irreplaceable objects found here. The Simeone Foundation Museum brings new meaning to the term “interactive.”

The Simeone also boasts an amazing library with period brochures, magazines, books, letters and other documents covering historic vehicles throughout the 20th century. I have found it a vital source of information for writing and restoration projects on which I've worked.

Research and connoisseurship

As archives go, if the Revs Institute/Collier Collection in Naples, FL, only consisted of its document and photographic materials, I would rank it as one of the most important, useful and simply entertaining institutions around. When you add to that what is arguably the most important assemblage of antique, vintage, classic and collectible automobiles on the planet, you'll agree that it is a must-see destination.

Here the keywords are connoisseurship, rarity, historic significance, preservation, responsible restoration and research. Another collector might have purchased the legendary Briggs Cunningham Collection, dusted the cars, hung a sign, unlocked the door occasionally and called it a day.

The one-of-a-kind Miles Collier couldn't conceive of such an approach. To say that the legacy of America's first and greatest motor sportsman is more secure now than when it was in Cunningham's own hands is no exaggeration. That Collier has added to the collection in a painstakingly thoughtful manner with more historic sports racing, grand touring and historically significant vernacular cars from the late 19th through the 20th century takes it beyond the next level.

The themed displays and incredibly gifted docents bring these remarkable vehicles to vivid life. To be near some of these cars is to feel transported in time and to be in the presence of the legends who owned and drove them.

Culture and context

I get a lot of enjoyment out of visits to the Petersen Automotive Museum in Los Angeles, CA. Now in its 24th year, the Petersen is enjoying a well-deserved renaissance following a massive renovation and redesign finished in December, 2015.

What do I love about the Petersen? It celebrates car culture as only a museum located in Southern California can — a nexus of people and their inescapable vehicles. I appreciate it when a museum does a consistent and credible job of contextualizing exhibitions.

It's easy to park a car in a museum. It's less so to be able to tell a visitor, whether sophisticated and experienced or a neophyte, why the car is there and why they should care. The Petersen does it brilliantly, with a range of cars from classics to hot rods, race cars to low riders. My taste in cars is broad — I may not want to write a check for or live with some, but I appreciate being introduced to and coming to appreciate cars I might not have otherwise.

As I wrote near the beginning of this piece, it's tough to limit myself to just a few. I'll conclude with a short list of some of the other museums I've spent memorable hours in and why. I hope you have the opportunity to visit them too.

We have an extensive automotive education department — many high schools in Oregon lack the facilities and resources to host an auto education program, so World of Speed is filling this gap. This innovative program is the result of a partnership between school districts, World of Speed and Clackamas Community College. Students take part in classes such as Automotive Fundamentals, General Auto Repair, and Small Engine Repair. Students also get behind-the-scenes tours with World of Speed Curator Ron Huegeli, and the chance to hear industry professionals share their experiences. ■
